Experts said such a line would give the allies material advantage over the Germans, as it can be strongly en-trenched and its angles rest on powerfully fortified positions.

It will compel the Germans, too, to divide their force in order to move against the various places of the greatest natural strength.

GERMAN ATTACKS ABATING IN FURY

Their Right Said to Be Taking Desperate Chances of Being Trapped

The Germans were forty miles from Paris today.

Their right wing's advance guard had forced its way to Pierrefonds; midway between Complegne and Soissone.

The French view was that they would reach Paris' northern fortifications but would fail to isolate the city.

In London also experts expressed the opinion that the dan-ger of the French metropolis's capture was over.

The fury of the supposedly exhausted Germans' attack was reported diminishing.

Their right wing's communi-cation lines, too, were said to be so extended as to be in danger. Hints were in the air that the wing was entering a trap. The French center held its own against the Germans.
